Our clear recommendation is for buying organic pecan nuts now!
Find out the background

The organic pecan harvest for this season is in full swing. The following market developments are currently taking place in both the USA and Mexico:

Harvest status in the USA and Mexico

In Mexico, around 70% of the harvest has already been completed. However, a lower yield is expected for the "premium" quality this year. In the USA, the harvest has only just begun in some regions. Hurricane Helene has had a significant impact here, which is why the harvest yield is expected to be 10% lower than last year.

Rising demand

The demand for Mexican organic pecan nuts is growing steadily - both in the USA and in Europe. This could lead to even greater pressure on availability and prices.

Geopolitical uncertainties

The trade tariffs of 25% on imported goods from Canada, Mexico and China announced by Donald Trump could have an additional impact on the market and possibly also lead to a price increase in the EU. Donald Trump is hinting at using tariffs as leverage in trade and immigration negotiations - an approach that could also affect agricultural products such as pecan nuts. Economists are warning of rising import costs and possible price increases for consumers.

Recommendation for action

In order to counteract potential supply bottlenecks or price increases, we strongly recommend securing sufficient orders at an early stage.
